Honesty and Integrity are foundations of developing strong leadership skills.

Employers are looking for those who have strong communication skills that will develop interpersonal connections with co-workers.

Showing that you have an ability to lead goes hand in hand with the ability to follow. Leadership skills are instrumental in standing out to employers.

Showing that you are flexible, whether that is in traveling for work, ability to work with others, or take charge in a new project is important to employers.

Self-confidence in your degree and experiences will show employers that you are ready to take on their challenges. Additionally, having the confidence in your skills will set the tone for what you can achieve.

The ability to work with others is key to organizations growing. Employers are looking for those who show a willingness to work with and have the ability to listen and learn from others.

There will be many times in your career that you will have to take charge of a project. Showing your employer that you have the ability to take initiative with self-motivation will give them confidence in you.

A strong work ethic can be discovered through your references. By developing this work ethic throughout your degree studies you can build a foundation of references who can vouch for your achievements.

Lastly, but maybe most important is your enthusiasm. You need to stand out for the right reasons and your enthusiasm to take on challenges, work with others, and take initiative will stand out above your resume.
